

FROM TINA:

Parking downtown is pricey so I have always enjoyed the hike across the bridges that span the Spokane River. These photos are of the upper falls.

The bus station photos are included to show where Outreach takes place. I must say it is always a rich afternoon, both before, during, and after my shift.

Notice the person coming the escalator. A copy of Science and Health greets them.

A man pointed out the book to his companion, "You gotta read this book!" His companion took it and said, "Thank you." He himself has read five chapters and told me, "Your husband gave it to me."

(Bonnie Gregson's husband gave it to him but there is no need to explain.)

A Middle Eastern young fellow politely asked for a book and then headed off speaking in another language to someone on his cell phone. A little later he passed by wearing a warm smile and pounding his back pack, saying, "I still have your book right here." There were several others who stopped and either took periodicals or the textbook.

I am reminded of a book from the seventies - I never read it and yet never forgot the title either: Don't Push The River, It Flows By Itself.

That title describes Outreach and its overflowing and generous offering of a book that is changing the world's perception of God and man one copy at a time!

FROM BOB:

There's not much to report about my shift today, just a feeling that the staff and some of the "regulars" definitely appreciate our presence. I focused on holding a special idea of the one Mind and its myriad perfect manifestations flowing through and around the facility; that thought was reflected back in an unusual number of smiles from passersby and even a hug from an unlikely source.

Six or seven copies of S&H plus several old Sentinels plus four "Spiritual Healing in a Scientific Age" went out to interested parties. It was such a warm feeling simply to share the beautiful sense of spiritual togetherness.
